Introduction:

The Information and Communication Technology (ICT) revolution and the advent of the internet has had drastic and far-reaching impacts on the knowledge and information sector and added a new dimension to information retrieval platforms. The Information and communications technology have brought changes and transformation to academic libraries and information services. It has created an environment where rapid continuous changes have become the norms. Developments in Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) have a profound impact on every sphere of academic activities. Academic libraries are not an exception for this. It has reduced the library stature from custodian of our literary heritage to being a competitor among many others in the information society. Changes have been noticed in the academic libraries professionals, collection, and policies. Changes have seen in information seeking behavior of users. Their preferences have been changed. User satisfaction level has been increasing. Now libraries have been able to provide fast and seamless access of information to its users. In 21st century most of the Library resources in the recent past are being made available in electronic formats such as e-journals, e-books, databases, etc. Libraries are moving from print to e-resources either subscribing individually or through consortia because of its advantages over print resources. Recent studies show that users prefer e-journals than the print.. Managing e-journals and making them available to the users are easy. E-journals provide easy access, search and retrieval, navigation, linking the resources, etc. This seminar will provide a unique opportunity to LIS professionals to discuss, understand and know more about the different types ICT Impact On The Knowledge And Information Management.
